

International Day of Women and Girls in Science

First published 10th February 2020

Less than 30% of the world's researchers are women, according to UIS data. 11 February is designated as International Day of Women and Girls in Science to raise awareness of the inequality and to recognise the important roles that women and girls play in science and technology.

At SAERI we are keen to do our part to encourage the next generation of female scientists. To show you just what you can achieve within a career in science, we are sharing some stories from just a few of the female scientists we work with.

Click the image below for our video

